Coast Guard Sector Western Alaska and U.S. Arctic holds change of command ceremony in Anchorage

ANCHORAGE, Alaska — Capt. Joel Carse relieved Capt. Christopher Culpepper as sector commander of Coast Guard Sector Western Alaska and U.S. Arctic during a change of command ceremony Friday at Joint Base Elmendorf-Richardson. Rear Adm. Robert Little, commander, Coast Guard Arctic District, presided over the event.

Carse is reporting from the Office of Emergency Management and Disaster Response at Coast Guard Headquarters. He led and shaped the Coast Guard's strategic readiness and crisis response efforts across all threats and hazards. Carse graduated from Officer Candidate School in 2003 after serving 10 years in the U.S. Navy as a petty officer first class damage controlman, where he achieved the Surface and Aviation Warfare Specialist qualification. "I am honored and humbled to be taking command of Sector Western Alaska and U.S. Arctic," Carse said. "The men and women of this command stand at the forefront of some of the Coast Guard's highest priority and most impactful missions, serving communities across Alaska while protecting our nation's strategic maritime interests in the Arctic. I look forward to serving alongside this exceptional team and our partners throughout the region."

Culpepper, who has served as Sector Western Alaska and U.S. Arctic's commanding officer since 2023, will report to Washington, D.C., for assignment as director of Law Enforcement, Maritime Security, and Defense Operations Policy.

Sector Western Alaska and U.S. Arctic is the Coast Guard's largest sector in terms of geographic area, exercising authority in a jurisdiction extending throughout the Arctic and Western Alaska, the North Slope, the Aleutian Islands, and Prince William Sound.

Alaska legislators

vision's actions, including Rep. Mia Costello, R-Anchorage, who said the division has a responsibility to protect the ballot from confusing or misleading voters. "The division does have a responsibility to determine whether or not the voters are being misled, whether it has to do with how long they've lived here, whether it has to do with their name," Costello said, and questioned whether Sullivan's motives should be further investigated by the U.S. Department of Justice or the Federal Elections Commission. "I hope that this issue is resolved, so that anybody who wants to run for office in the state of Alaska can do it, but they cannot do it in a manner that is going to confuse or undermine the importance of elections," she said. But Dunmire, with Legislative Legal Services, said while the state can investigate allegations of campaign misconduct, the division has no authority to investigate a candidate's motives in running for office. "It is not the division's role, they have no explicit authority in situations like this to look into a candidate's motivations," he said. Dunmire noted state regulation has rules for when two candidates with the same name appear on the ballot. Candidates' names would appear with a middle initial, in this case the challenger as "Dan J. Sullivan," and the incumbent as "Dan S. Sullivan."

Hollis French, a former state senator and prosecutor, was invited to testify before the committee and did not mince words. "I don't think you would need any special legal training to smell a rat here," French said. "If a prisoner with no ties to the state of Alaska in New York state can be put on the ballot for federal office in the state of Alaska, I think the Division of Elections is sort of foreclosed from then on, from engaging in what they've engaged in this case."

French said as a prosecutor, it's nearly impossible to prove someone's motives. He emphasized the division can take steps to distinguish the two names on the ballot, and then it's up to candidates to campaign and appeal to voters. "There's a way to designate that in a neutral manner on the ballot, and then put the burden on the candidates to remind everybody that they're the Dan Sullivan from Fairbanks or the Dan Sullivan with an S, or the Dan Sullivan with a J," he said.

Rep. Ashley Carrick, D-Fairbanks and chair of the House State Affairs Committee, said she was highly concerned about a subjective standard for candidates imposed by the division that may erode the trust of voters. "I think there's a clear risk in the longer-term future to the Division of Elections and Alaska's election integrity if we see mistakes or differences of opinion in how this authority to investigate can be utilized," she said. "And really, truly, my biggest concern here is that if 'good faith,' as was stated in the memo from the Division of Elections, becomes an additional implicit standard for candidacy, Alaska will have added more than just an additional requirement. We will have functionally added a subjective standard for qualification to run for office."
