Nome Search and Rescue
 Update: With the assistance of the Alaska Army National Guard and Nome SAR the bodies of Charlene Habros and Dustin Gologergen have been recovered and transported to Nome. Their bodies will be sent to the State Medical Examiners Office in Anchorage for autopsy. Next of kin have been notified.

Update: On December 12, 2023, at 3:15 p.m., a search team arrived at the location where the snowmachine was observed by the C130, and located Charlene Habros, 34 of Nome, and Dustin Gologergen, 55 of Nome, deceased. Next of kin have been notified.

 On December 11, 2023, at 7:09 am, the Alaska State Troopers received a report of two overdue snowmachines who were traveling from Teller to Nome. An adult male and adult female were using a single snowmachine to drive the Nome-Teller Road and didn't reach their destination. Search teams from Teller and Nome were requested to initiate a ground search. Teller SAR Team was initially unavailable, and Nome SAR was able to make it to mile 23 before having to return due to a ground storm. The Alaska State Troopers chartered a helicopter to search from the air; however, weather prevented the helicopter from flying in the search area. The Alaska National Guard deployed a C130 to the search area, which located a snowmachine near mile 41 with no signs of the two. A Teller-based SAR team was unable to reach the site overnight due to the poor weather, and road-clearing crews from Nome were also unable to make it to the site from the Nome side. Teams are working to make it to the snowmachine; however, extreme weather is preventing a safe method of travel for ground or aerial teams. Once weather allows, search teams will travel to the area.

Dunleavy proposes ‘status quo’ Alaska budget, nearly $1 billion deficit to be filled by savings

By Yereth Rosen
Alaska Beacon

With a deep reduction in oil revenues expected, Alaska is on track to have an approximately $1 billion budget hole in the coming year that will have to be filled with money from savings accounts, according to a spending plan presented Thursday by Gov. Mike Dunleavy.

The governor described his budget for the year beginning next July 1 as “status quo” in most categories. The proposal totals $13.9 billion, including funds from all federal and state sources.

“There’s no cuts in this budget,” he said during a news conference in Juneau. There are even a few targeted areas with increases, he said.

The anticipated $987 million deficit would be filled with money from two savings accounts, the Constitutional Budget Reserve and the Statutory Budget Reserve, according to Dunleavy’s budget.

The governor’s budget likely understates the looming deficit, said state Sen. Bert Stedman, R-Sitka, who co-chairs the Senate Finance Committee.

There are items missing in the submitted budget, including some expected capital items, meaning the final hole to be filled is likely to be more in the range of $1.3 billion to $1.5 billion, Stedman said in an interview. Lawmakers will face the challenge of balancing needed state spending with the necessity of preserving the Constitutional Budget Reserve and other savings accounts, he said.

“We don’t have a robust cash position in the CBR, by any means,” he said. “It’s unlikely that the Legislature will have a desire to A, overdraw the Permanent Fund, or B, empty the CBR.”

As he has in past years, Dunleavy included in his new budget a large Alaska Permanent Fund dividend based on a payout formula that has not been used for several years.

Under that “statutory dividend,” formula, the 2024 payout would likely be well above $3,000, in contrast with the $1,312 that was paid out this year. Such large formula-driven payouts have not been made since 2015. In the years since then, Permanent Fund investment earnings have supplanted oil money as the state’s top revenue source, aside from federal contributions.

Stedman said there is virtually no chance that the Legislature will agree to the large payout that Dunleavy’s budget proposes.

“On the statutory dividend, it still remains unaffordable. The math hasn’t changed,” Stedman said in an interview. But since the statute on the payout formula remains on the books, “I don’t fault him a bit for putting it into the budget,” he said.

The state’s revenue picture is dimmed by a significant decline in oil revenues, according to the official semiannual forecast released by the state in conjunction with release of the governor’s budget.

The state’s total unrestricted oil revenues – money that is available for regular state appropriations – is expected to be $2.4 billion for the 12 months ending next June 30, down from the total of $3.1 billion for the 12 months prior to that, according to the Department of Revenue forecast. Total unrestricted oil revenues flowing into the state treasury in fiscal 2025, which comprises the period from July 1, 2024, to June 30, 2025, is expected to be even lower, at under $2.1 billion, according to the forecast.

That decline in revenues is tied to production that is lower than earlier projected.

North Slope production that peaked at over 2 million barrels per day in 1988 has declined as fields have aged; the last fiscal year in which it averaged over 500 million barrels a day was 2018, according to the state Department of Revenue.

Dunleavy acknowledged that the reduction in oil revenues puts the state in a difficult financial situation.

“If we were allowed to develop every play we have, every oil play we have, every gas play we have, every mining play we have, our revenue would be double, triple what it is today,” Dunleavy said at the news conference.

He blamed the state’s inability to earn that money squarely on the administration of President Joe Biden and national environmental groups. However, the federal government is on track to contribute over $6.27 billion to the state in the coming fiscal year, making it the largest source of revenue in Dunleavy’s budget.

While the governor bemoaned Alaska’s loss of working-age adults as a sign that the state is “shrinking” and poised to continue to shrink in the long term, his budget included some targeted areas of increased spending for at least the short term.

One is public safety, where his budget is calling for money to hire more village public safety officers and buy a new airplane, along with a new patrol boat to be used in Southeast Alaska. The latter would have been helpful in the response to the deadly landslide that struck the island of community of Wrangell last month, said James Cockrell, commissioner of the Department of Public Safety. “We could have housed, provided food and lodging and (brought) more first responders to the area,” Cockrell said in the news conference.

Another area where Dunleavy’s budget proposes some increased
